Kyle makes it clear that the Roman death spectacles served a serious social purpose, not the least of which was feeding the people with the bodies of the animals killed. You could say that the Roman games were something of an equivalent to modern day factory farming - so we really aren't any better than they were.

Provincial evidence is often considered expediently in order to support some point made concerning the spectacles in the capital. Kyle too concentrates primarily on events in Rome itself -- though this may be fair enough since the book is entitled, Spectacles of Death in Ancient Rome, not in the Ancient Roman Empire or something similar.
